Industry and Opportunity

Less than 15 percent of the Edtech Industry is focused on addressing the skill gap, which has been reported by 67 percent of companies as a major issue that plagues their organization's workforce. This is in contrast to the more than 80 percent of the Edtech Industry that is focused on k-12 students and graduate students.

There is a gap in the Edtech Industry while effort to address the focus on skill gaps at either the corporate or individual levels are concerned. There is limited competition which offer individualised training courses through their portal, which is made available for both organisations and individuals, comes in a format that is both organised and digital.

Competition

Some of the direct competitors are SimpliLearn, Udemy, SkillSoft etc. They offer Course Libraries at a subscription price to corporates. Small training companies and freelance trainers with limited course offerings in their own network or channel are examples of indirect competitors.

iSkillBox seeks to differentiate itself through a customised offering, on-demand learning, an AI-driven engine for career pathway recommendations, training need analysis and counselling to their customers via B2B & B2C channels. The existing knowledge base and exceptional market reach through their own community as well as industry experience and connections with trainer experts of various skills and expertise.

Risk

- ♦ Price war between Edtech companies/Trainers having price control over their course. Considering size of the market there will always be a scope to take reasonable size pie with quality contents.
- ♦ Data theft due to a security breach. To mitigate this risk, company plan to take multiple steps on procedural parts and technology.
- ♦ The learning curve for trainers to get familiar with the portal might be too steep. It can be mitigated with continuous refinement of induction programs.
